January 12-22

So far I had to push many dates up in my project management document. The cause is mainly that I did not accomplish anything during winter break. This project does not necessarily have to be done chronologically but I decided to move all dates up so I would not have to work on too many things at the same time.

At this point, I have began and nearly completed the data and research gathering for my project. Appropriately splitting up the map was the hardest part about this because data is organized in many different ways. For example, all of the population data is available exclusively by county, while reservoir storage is available by individual reservoir, or hydrology district. After collecting all of the data, I determined the best way to compile it was by hydrology district. This meant that all data had to be converted into hydrology district. That was not easy. The second hardest part was trying to find data from 1988-1992. Eventually, I came across a 50 page report that was very helpful.

Before the next journal entry, I hope to have a clearer idea about the actual layout of the maps even though my pmd doesn't have any milestone dates coming up.
